Let's support the struggle for justice by Rite Aid workers!

Rite Aid, the nation's third-largest retail drug chain, has been struggling financially for years. Yet, despite management's serious and costly mistakes – which have left the company deeply in debt – Rite Aid bosses have rewarded themselves with handsome compensation packages. Now top management is trying to balance their books by overcharging workers for health insurance. For example:

- At the giant Lancaster, CA, distribution center, Rite Aid is trying to gouge employees by marking-up their cost of health insurance by 28 times over the increases being charged by insurers.
- In Cleveland, dedicated Rite Aid store clerks, who have foregone raises for years in order to maintain affordable health care, are facing such severe increases in health insurance costs they may be forced to strike;
- In New Jersey, Rite Aid also is looking to gouge employees by changing their already expensive health care plan to an even more unaffordable plan and trying to prevent workers at its newly acquired stores from joining a union to secure their rights on the job.
- In Pennsylvania, Rite Aid has been trying extract harsh concessions from store employees for months, weakening morale.

There is another way.

Instead of battling against workers, Rite Aid executives should be working with employees to solve problems, improve service and ensure customer satisfaction. That's the best way to turn the company around.
